Capgemini Financial Services Recognized for its Commitment to Education

Capgemini's Financial Sector School awarded by LOMA for creating a collaborative learning environment for employees

NEW YORK, August 5, 2008 – Capgemini's Financial Sector School, the official training program of Capgemini's Financial Services Strategic Business Unit, was recognized today by LOMA with the 2008 Excellence in Education award. Capgemini was selected for promoting its educational programs and significantly increasing the number of LOMA certifications held by employees.

"This award reaffirms Capgemini's commitment to education and deep domain knowledge in financial services," said Raymond Spencer, CEO, Capgemini Financial Services SBU. "Through the Financial Sector School's high-quality, integrated platform, we create more value not only for our clients, but for our organization overall."

This year's Excellence in Education award is the second time that Capgemini's Financial Sector School has been recognized for developing and empowering Capgemini employees and accelerating their career growth, while delivering best-in-class solutions. Since inception, the Financial Sector School has quickly become the cornerstone for building Capgemini's domain expertise in financial services.

"The projected growth of the financial services industry requires partnerships with knowledgeable, skilled companies that will provide the products and services necessary to compete in a heavily regulated space," said Ajinth Sreedharan, director of the Financial Sector School and Learning. "By adopting a LOMA model focused on banking, insurance, and capital markets and through collaboration with our business units around the globe, we have designed a curriculum to equip our consultants with the tools to bring clients our delivery excellence."
